

Joshua Volansky

Writing

Mrs. Laurentius

28/8/24

Mrs. Laurentius is a teacher at Queen of All Saints. Currently, she teaches seventh and eighth grade writing as well as sixth grade literature and seventh grade homeroom. She has wanted to be a teacher for a very long time and played school during her childhood with her younger brother and younger cousins being her students. Mrs. Laurentius earned her elementary education degree at the University of Saint Louis so that she could stay close to her family. While in college, she sometimes faced difficulties relating to academics, but she managed to persevere and get her degree despite the challenges. Directly after finishing college, Mrs. Laurentius found a job at City Academy, where she taught elementary school for twelve years. Due to the distance between her home and her job, Mrs. Laurentius eventually moved to Queen of All Saints after her time at City Academy.

Mrs. Laurentius was inspired to become a teacher by her mother and grandma, who were both teachers and great role models for her. Mrs. Laurentius chose to teach reading and writing at Queen of All Saints because she loves those subjects and believes that they are extremely important subjects for all students to learn, as they help with communication and provide a good basis for students to work off of in the future. Across her entire teaching career, Mrs. Laurentius has taught second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth grade. In her experience, Mrs.

Laurentius finds that properly disciplining kids is one of the most challenging parts of being a teacher, as she has to make the class fun and engaging while managing to maintain some amount of order. One of the best parts of teaching for Mrs. Laurentius is getting to know her students and allowing them to learn new things with her help. In conclusion, Mrs. Laurentius is a very interesting person with plenty of things to tell people.